Amanda A. Simpson is office managing principal of the Orlando, Florida, office of Jackson Lewis P.C., co-leader of the firm's Restaurants industry group, co-leader of the firm's Privacy and Data Litigation group, and a core member of the Class Actions and Complex Litigation and Wage and Hour practice groups. Amanda believes it is her professional calling to stand with and for her clients to educate, minimize legal risks, and when faced with litigation achieve the most advantageous outcome in every case.

It only took litigating one highly complex case through trial in federal court early in her career for Amanda to be certain that her practice would primarily involve class actions and complex litigation. For Amanda, to play a small part in shaping the law by ensuring her clients' interests are represented in court is a privilege. She knows that at the heart of every significant litigation is the employer's business and works to strategically uncover the truth behind a plaintiff's allegations. Defending a class action is synonymous to a high-wire balancing act – the stakes are high, but methodically and strategically planning every step can get her client to the other side safely. By efficiently marshalling resources, Amanda is energized by leading teams of her Jackson Lewis colleagues, united in the common goal of helping the client defend against serious allegations.

Amanda regularly represents clients on a wide range of employment issues, including wage and hour, independent contractor misclassification, background screening, data privacy, non-compete, whistleblower, discrimination and retaliation claims. She also works closely with employers on Department of Labor audits as well as voluntary self-audits as to the exemption status of hundreds of positions. Just as important as litigation matters, Amanda's practice allows her to provide employers with practical advice and counsel to help avoid litigation. She understands that the goals and operations of each client's business are unique and works closely with employers to develop a plan to reduce risk and minimize legal costs that is specific to their business needs. Amanda gives advice on the full spectrum of the employment relationship, from hiring and promotions to disciplinary action and terminations. Clients know her to be personable and passionate about their specific business needs.

Amanda's collective and class action practice is nationwide. Amanda defends employers in various high stakes, complex litigation, pled on a class basis as to numerous wage and hour practices, including but not limited to misclassification, off-the-clock work, meal and rest break violations and regular rate of pay calculations. Amanda also has extensive experience in defending these claims when brought as mass arbitrations.

Amanda counsels countless companies regarding compliance with data privacy laws, including the Telephone Consumer Protection Act and Florida Telephone Solicitation Act. She has litigated numerous putative class action lawsuits involving alleged violations of these acts in state and federal courts throughout the country.

Living in Florida and starting out in the hospitality industry, Amanda has always felt a connection to an industry that brings people together to socialize over good food and drinks. Her close ties to the industry continue as a lawyer and a co-leader of our Restaurant industry team.

Amanda speaks and trains on a variety of workplace-related issues, including hot-button wage and hour issues, how to approach complex litigation across multiple jurisdictions, and using creative tools to decrease the risk of potential litigation. She believes that education and manager training are key to helping clients navigate ever-changing workplace regulations, stay apprised of critical information, and avoid litigation.
