Wage and Hour

Two years ago, the New York State Department of Labor (NYSDOL) issued final regulations implementing changes resulting from increases to the minimum wage. The state minimum wage for non-exempt employees and the salary level for exempt employees will increase in 2019, with different rates applicable depending on where the employees work and the size of the employer (in New York City only). The upcoming 2019 minimum wage rates are set forth below.

New Predictive Scheduling Regulations

The NYSDOL issued sweeping proposed regulations addressing worker scheduling practices in December. Those regulations will affect most employers in the state and approximately one million workers, according to estimates provided by the NYSDOL. The proposed regulations will require employers to provide, among other things, “call-in pay” (ranging from 2-4 hours at the minimum wage) if employers:

1. Do not provide non-exempt employees 14 days’ advance notice of their work shift;
2. Cancel employee shifts without at least 14 days’ advance notice;
3. Require employees to work “on-call”; or
4. Require non-exempt employees to report to work but then send them home prior to the end of their shift.

There are several exceptions to the proposed regulations and employers should carefully review them to determine whether their workers are covered and whether any exceptions apply. The regulations likely will become effective in the first quarter of 2019.

Other Changes Afoot?

Although the predictive scheduling regulations were already in the works before to the November elections, the impact of those elections on New York’s wage and hour (and other employment) laws remains to be seen, given that, for the first time since 2010, Democrats will control the state’s entire government, having gained a majority in the state Senate. Thus, expect some issues to get another look. In 2018, for example, the NYSDOL held hearings regarding possible elimination of the tip credit (i.e., requiring employers of tipped employees to pay workers the full minimum wage, rather than permitting the employers, as currently is the law, to pay tipped employees a direct wage below minimum wage and then take a credit for tips received by employees to satisfy the minimum wage).

Next Steps

Employers should ensure that their non-exempt employees are paid in accordance with the new minimum wage rates noted above and that exempt employees subject to a salary basis requirement are paid at the noted minimum salary level. Additionally, employers should ensure that all employees receive updated notices of their new rates in accordance with the New York State Wage Theft Prevention Act, which requires employers to provide notice of pay changes to employees.
